

Are you a hacker? Do you want to hack Facebook account? After a series of high-profile data breaches, it's natural to be wary of giving out personal information on social media, but there are no hackers at the end of the rainbow. At least not for average people. While that's technically true, there is an app called Facebook Hacker V290 50 that claims to give users access to any private Facebook account they want. Scam or not, we'll never know — we weren't able to find an actual link or developer in anyway related to this app in Google or anywhere else online. NOTE This app requires you to have root access to your phone or tablet. Facebook Hacker V290 50 is available at various mobile app stores. As of this writing, it's free after a single in-app purchase. We didn't download it ourselves but one user wrote that the application was easy to use and worked immediately. This malware can target Facebook users with ease due to Facebook making its login process fairly open. The application sends some private information, including the current time and device ID, according to the app description then creates an account for you on some other non-Facebook website which can be used for any number of online scams or other nefarious activities. In order to get the account, the victim should have a "rooted" device. In simple words, a rooted device is one that has a user with root access. This process is too complicated to explain in this article, but you can google it if you would like more information on how to root your phone or tablet. The quality of cyber-attacks have increased dramatically over the years and will continue to do so as time progresses. Be proactive about your digital security and do research before downloading any application- even if it's free or available at an app store that you trust.
