The reason I ask is because I discovered the master password to unlock my iMac (OS X 10.6.8) recently, and I am concerned that if I store the master password in an encrypted file, then anyone who could have access to that file (for example, someone in a poor state of mind) might be able to use it to unlock my iMac. Of course, if this were to happen, the only thing that would be unlocked would be a computer that I've lost my personal files on. Is there a better way to store this key? They may have just got their hands on a copy and are trying to unlock it for themselves (or someone else who might be able to access it) in the future. Keep an eye on it and keep your password manager in a secure place that you can access without danger. Treat your master password as the closest thing to your heart. You use this one master password for many things. It unlocks your encrypted home directory. It unlocks your
