Elevated CD39 activity is associated with increased mortality in patients with large atherothrombotic infarcts. Levels of circulating CD39 are elevated in cardiovascular disease, but its functional role in this process is unknown. Using a large cohort of African-Americans participating in an observational study, we assessed whether CD39 activity is linked with large atherothrombotic infarct (ATI) size. The trial design is a prospective, longitudinal observational study of African-American patients at a university teaching hospital with a clinical diagnosis of ATI. Enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay was used to measure circulating CD39 levels in plasma samples taken
