If Apple can keep from the fanboys and have a good track record with the new models (or at least maintain what they've already had), I think it'd be the best route. I honestly don't know what the future of the Mac has but I just hope that it lasts long enough to see the Mac OS X consumer version release. - Price Increase, But without a new pricetag "Apple will more than likely jump the 10 percent to 20 percent across the board price increases the iPhone 4 received for the 4S, according to information from respected sources. [Apple] is giving each company a 6 percent price bump. Apple will likely have to give each company a 6 percent price bump to get it's competitors pricing in line with apple. If you look at the current decline in prices, Apple is running a price war. - Far fewer songs per iCloud purchase than the 3GS. - The iPod touch (and therefore the iPhone) is going to be even more modular than it was before, with the possibility of additional accessories in the future. - The iPad will be more expensive than it was before, and there may not be any more capacity upgrades. - iPod nano will remain cheaper than the 4th generation iPod touch. - You still need a Apple ID in order to shop at the Apple Stores and make online purchases. You have to provide your credit card information when ordering an iPhone, iPad or computer. - There may be fewer Apple Stores, or stores that are not as big or fancy, but the Apple Stores will remain a distinct experience. - There may be less expensive options and lower spec products, but none of the products are going to be as cheap as the current non-Apple line of products. - Battery life is still expected to be extremely good
