The growth of interest in design of experiments (DOE) has led to the development of a number of software packages (and some authors) to help researchers generate designs faster and more efficiently than they could otherwise, through the use of the “Design” command. One popular example is Design-Expert 8 Crack Free Download. A comparative study was carried out to evaluate the performance of a new vignetting-corrected Koehler illumination in automated flat-field calibration of astronomical cameras. This work is based on a comparison between the performance of an ancient vignetting-corrected Koehler flatfield illumination technique and a new vignetting-corrected Koehler flatfield that has been optimized for the IFU cameras that we are currently developing. Based on this study, our results show that the proposed vignetting-corrected Koehler illumination technique that has been optimized for the IFU cameras we are developing is not only more efficient at flat-field calibration, but it also produces better image quality flat-field images than the technique used in earlier studies. In addition, two state-of-the-art software packages, PRESTO and SExtractor, were used to compare their performance with our proposed technique. A new vignetting-corrected Koehler flatfield is proposed to meet the following criteria: a) it has been optimized for the IFU cameras we are developing, b) it was shown to provide better flat-field quality than the older technique, and c) it can be applied to any future IFU camera that does not use the octant lenses, as all of the two-lens optics of the IFU camera are flat (orthogonal to the detector plane). This technique includes five different correcting radii and eight different angles, so it has a relatively large range of configurations. We use the proposed technique to correct all flat field images. Since vignetting effects result in reduced image quality, our technique enables us to improve flat field quality and our results show that the flat field produced by our proposed technique is less affected by vignetting compared to the traditional technique. The advantages of our proposed technique are as follows: a) it enables us to correct for the effects of vignetting on the images of galaxies at large angular separations (large objects suffer from severe vignetting in an image),
