Transgender patients will be allowed to have gender reassignment surgery in Northern Ireland, under changes to the NHS. The move comes after the UK Supreme Court ruled Northern Ireland discriminated against two transgender people who had been denied treatment. The move means trans people will not have to pay for the operation and will be treated by a specialist team at the specialist NHS centres in Belfast and Londonderry. First Minister Peter Robinson said it would help transgender people "to fully realise their potential". 'Great victory' The change is expected to come into effect in early April. Media playback is unsupported on your device Media caption Lord Wilson of Dinton, lead claimant in the Supreme Court case, made the announcement on the steps of Belfast City Hall. Lord Wilson of Dinton, the chief executive of the Human Rights Commission for Northern Ireland, said: "This is a great victory for us as a society and also for us as a commission. "It is a symbolic act of reconciliation and that is something that we can all celebrate. "It does mean that some fundamental human rights are being upheld and recognised and accepted in Northern Ireland." Belf 2d92ce491b
