Some of them have been killed already, and if there’s more that’s going to happen in the next few days, we really need to act now,” said William Pace, the deputy secretary-general of the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA). “This is the final push. The last few areas that are remaining now are in the hands of the military,” he told Reuters at the U.N.’s sprawling office in Yangon. The government and the main rebel faction, the Northern Alliance, have been fighting for control of the border region for four years, fighting that has displaced hundreds of thousands and forced more than a million people from their homes. But one side has been using heavy weaponry, including white phosphorus, which can burn the flesh of people and animals and has been outlawed by the U.N. as a weapon of war. The conflict has killed nearly 400 people and displaced more than 100,000, according to the U.N. The fighting in Kokang has killed at least 61 people, U.N. officials said last week, and Pace said the United Nations had not been able to verify the reports. “If these numbers are true, I think they’re much higher than what has been previously reported,” he said. Government spokesman Zaw Htay said the military had been attacking Kokang “to remove the terrorists” and that 1,200 civilians had been evacuated. “This is not a military attack. It’s a military operation by the government of Myanmar,” Zaw Htay said at a news conference in Naypyidaw, the capital. “We are just doing this because we want to clear the area.” Slideshow (10 images)
