Ana Alcolea y la ruta de Juan Román Riquelme.Cognitive and clinical assessment of patients with frontotemporal lobar degeneration. To clarify the neuropsychological and clinical features of patients with frontotemporal lobar degeneration (FTLD), the authors assessed 42 patients with FTLD and 21 with Alzheimer's disease (AD) by a standardized set of neuropsychological tests. The patients with FTLD were classified into the following groups according to the neuropathological findings: limbic predominant FTLD (n = 14), aphasic predominant FTLD (n = 10), and nonfluent/agrammatic predominant FTLD (n = 18). The neuropsychological profiles of these FTLD patients were compared with those of AD patients. The FTLD patients performed significantly poorer on tests of abstract reasoning and memory than AD patients. No significant differences in the clinical features of the FTLD patients were found between the limbic and nonfluent/agrammatic subtypes. However, the rate of psychiatric manifestations, parkinsonism, and spasticity was higher in the aphasic subgroup than in the other FTLD subtypes. The prognosis of AD patients was found to be associated with performance on the Mini-Mental State Examination. FTLD patients have distinct neuropsychological profiles. These data should facilitate the differential diagnosis of FTLD from AD. They work with agents at their insurance carrier to handle direct policyholder requests. This saves you time as you don't have to deal with the carrier. The agent will often have access to more information on your policies and products than you. Independent agents do not work for any insurance carrier. You can choose to work with an independent agent instead of the carrier directly. This gives you the ability to choose what insurance products and carriers you 2d92ce491b
