The PDF version of books found on TheMiddleEast.org is written in Adobe InDesign format."I want to work more. I want to help other people with this disease and spread the word about it. I want to work hard and achieve my goals. If I don't work now, if I don't fight now, I could easily grow old, give up, and I wouldn't achieve anything. I have to fight now." When she started on her journey to find a cure, she knew what she wanted out of life; she didn't even know what she wanted out of therapy yet. All she knew was that she wanted to help people who suffered with this disease, and if she could help one, she would be happy. As she worked with her therapist, the line between reality and dreams started to blur. She began to feel an almost uncontrollable urge to paint. She'd get a little watercolor paint and a canvas and she'd just go. If anyone else would see her, they would say, "she's been painting all day, why is she still awake," but the reality of it was, she was just so happy to be in the studio. She was working hard, using oils, but she felt like she was painting because she was inspired from another place. She wasn't thinking about anything, she was just in her head and trying to make it fit into a picture. It was ecstatic, but so weird. However, when she would speak to her loved ones, they would ask, "what are you working on?" She would tell them, "oh, you know..." They'd say, "yeah, what are you working on?" She'd say, "it's pretty boring stuff actually." So she'd tell them, and they would respond, "the oil paintings are pretty good, but why are you painting the watercolors? The oils are so much better!" But the reality was, she didn't want to go back to oils, she just wanted to paint whatever came to her mind, and she was enjoying it. In the beginning of her art journey, she thought she was making progress and that she would become "a better and a better painter," but then she realized she was a "copy-cat artist." She was copying other artists' styles, and she was trying to make her style look like something that was already created. When she moved on to sculpture, it was like she was trying to copy Picasso.
