Go to the Markdown editor, select all the content of the first page (including the headline), copy it to the clipboard, and paste it to the Markdown editor. Now, at the bottom of the first page, click the button Clipboard. In the pop-up window, select Paste as plain text. The result will be exactly the same as in the first version of the question, with no change in the formatting. But, this time, the Paste as plain text button is visible on the top bar, and there are no indentations, nor are there bullets. This is a good way to attract attention to your question, because people who try to write answers will have to edit the first page anyway. = Question: Why was it important to write clear content, and why would it be important to put information in the title? A title must be no more than 120 characters, it's the first thing that appears on the search results, and it should be a good hint to the problem you're trying to solve. The description should be no more than 1,000 characters. The description will also appear on the search results, but it will be displayed below the title, where it won't be visible to people who are not interested in that particular question. You can learn more about the content filters in Stack Overflow, by clicking the question mark button on the top bar, and selecting Filters. = Question: How do I make my question look good? * Add a title, that contains a few words that describe the issue. * Add a description that is no longer than 1,000 characters. * Add tags that describe the issue, and no more than 50 tags. * Add the 'Code' and 'Language'
