Category:Computing culture Category:Hacking (computer security)The national discourse surrounding race and its intersections with gender, gender identity and sexuality, are in the midst of a conversation about the use of the “N-word”. A discussion about the use of the word and its appropriateness has been occurring in the mainstream media and has had some influence on the public. While this discussion is important, it is important to note that our understanding of racism must not be short-sighted and think that racism only occurs in our society. Racism, sexism, and every other form of bigotry is prevalent in our country. So while we talk about racism, it is important to also look at how and why we feel the way we do. While there is no denying that the N-word is a racist word, it also has several other connotations that come from its use and its history in America. This conversation often omits these important details in favor of a one-sided conversation about the “appropriateness” of using the N-word. While the word has a history in America, it does not reflect the experiences of African Americans in this country. In the United States, the word, N-word, has been used by white men as a derogatory term for black men and women. N-words have been used as a term of endearment among African Americans. For example, former President Barack Obama would tell reporters in 2008 that when he was a child, his niggas used to call him negro. Obama explained, “I said ‘yeah, I got a negro for a father, I got a negro for a mother, I got a negro for a sister, I got a negro for a brother’. And so you know what my parents said? ‘You ain’t no negro’”. While the N-word is still used to demean African Americans, it is important to note that the word was used with great affection in the past. The use of the N-word has been embedded in the United States culture. While the word is still used to demean African Americans, it is also used with great affection by black people. It is often seen as a term of endearment among black people. The history of the word begins 2d92ce491b
