Treaty of Concord The Treaty of Concord was a peace treaty signed in 1754 between France and Great Britain during the Seven Years' War. It ended the First Franco-British War, and was the first of many important treaties during the wars of the 18th century. It was also the first Anglo-French war in which France had to seek British military assistance, as France could not field a force of its own due to a bad harvest and loss of manpower. The treaty required the immediate withdrawal of all British troops from France. It took the form of an agreement between the two Great Powers and included the following articles: The Emperor assures the French nation and the French Government of the sincere friendship of the King of England towards the Emperor and his Kingdom; and on the part of the English King, he assures the Emperor and his subjects of his friendship and alliance with the Emperor, and of the desire that he shall be engaged in their favor and alliance. The two nations shall mutually withdraw their respective forces and to appoint a day for the Allies to evacuate the Netherlands. The Emperor and the King will agree on maritime affairs. In the first instance, the Emperor will free the Dutch fleet under the command of Admiral Ternay. In the case of a new violation of the peace, or if the Emperor's situation should become more difficult, the Imperialists may use their forces in defense of France or of the Emperor's person. The fleets of the two countries shall remain on the Hudson River, and the French shall have no forces at the mouth of the Delaware River. The French shall be at liberty to supply the troops of the Emperor, but will neither be allowed to place forces in that part of the Atlantic Ocean, nor to make any more excursions into Canada, nor to proceed to any expedition either by sea or land against the Iroquois, whether by a whole party or by a single individual. The French troops who go into the service of the Emperor shall have to serve him for the space of eight years, and their share of supplies shall be paid for at the rate of 40,000 livres per annum. The Emperor, in case the French decide to engage again in war against the King of Great Britain, will provide such assistance as he can, but he undertakes not to engage himself in the war, nor shall he hinder the King of Great Britain from
