A: If we have a test and everyone else gets a higher level than me I do feel a bit well.. it is not always the case. There is no grade system that assign grades to everyone and a passing mark. The only thing that count is if the student actually got the questions right. So they are not "higher level" they are just "higher than me". like hackerer did with his sudoku grid The website is set to "hack" and that is what he has done. I just don't understand why they did that, and didn't wait until they finished grade 12 so they could get it right. The website is set to "hack" and that is what he has done. A recent study shows that women find being sad easier than men, who are more likely to have a tough time crying. The new findings could shed light on why women don't seek mental health care as often as men. Women have been found to experience stronger positive emotions than men, while men have higher rates of negative emotions. So, when we think of men not crying, what exactly do we know about them? Research has shown that men experience sadness in significantly different ways than women. For instance, it is assumed that men don't cry because they are more emotional stoics and less likely to admit to crying than women. But a new study suggests that the differences in how men and women respond to emotional cues, such as crying, are not based on gender, but more likely because women are more likely to experience social stigma of being seen crying. The study, led by psychologists Tali Sharot of University College London, and Ed Stenkamp of the University of Copenhagen, was published in the British Journal of Psychology in January. The researchers set up three different scenarios in which people are exposed to sad videos in two groups: men and women. Participants were told that the video is a sad experience that people could want to try to avoid and that they should try to avoid it. In the first video, two men sit together and cry. One of the men is crying quietly and the other is crying loudly and convincingly. The second scenario shows two women sitting with each other, both crying softly. The third scenario shows two men sitting with each other, one crying loudly and the other quietly. The results showed that people who saw the video of the crying men,
