magnetization in graphene. We demonstrate that intervalley scattering in graphene generates an intravalley scattering rate which is strongly momentum dependent and crucially sensitive to the energy scale for electron-electron interaction. Such a strongly correlated system can serve as a platform to study nonequilibrium magnetization dynamics, including novel nonequilibrium chiral magnetic effects which do not exist in ordinary superconductors. We propose various scenarios of the nonequilibrium magnetization dynamics in graphene with time-dependent physical parameters, in which we investigate the role of intervalley scattering in generating an oscillating magnetization. These examples, which may be realized in future experiments, demonstrate the possibility of magnetization dynamics in graphene.
