In the practice of modern dentistry, it is necessary to prepare the surface of a tooth for the reception of a dental prosthesis. This preparation generally includes two processes, a "cavity preparation" and a "crown preparation". In a cavity preparation, a cavity, having a prepared wall is formed by removal of tooth structure to a predetermined depth from the surface of the tooth. The cavity must be deep enough to accommodate the depth of the crown (e.g. a replacement tooth). In preparing a crown, a cavity is first prepared having a wall of predetermined thickness and dimensions. The prepared cavity is then filled with a dental restoration material (e.g. an amalgam) or an adhesive material (e.g. an adhesive agent) or a combination thereof. The restoration material and/or adhesive material is then hardened in the cavity. While the above preparation process involves the formation of a cavity, most dental procedures involve some type of cutting or shaping of the tooth. For example, to prepare the surface of a tooth for crown preparation, a dental drill is used to remove a selected amount of the hard tooth structure from the surface of the tooth. A dental saw is often used to shape a tooth to precisely the configuration desired for the crown. A dental drill is typically used to cut or shape a tooth for various other reasons, including shaping the surface of a tooth for bonding a crown thereto or cutting an incipient carious lesion.
