IrProjector is a free application designed to help you make your computer's screen light up. It has been featured on BBC, The Telegraph and a variety of other publications. The basis of the application is an algorithm that converts the image signal from the screens into a constant brightness. This is done by displaying the video in the specific hues as well as colors that are white and light up the screen. The image is rendered from the picture The basis of the algorithm is a specific picture that is transferred into a consistent hue for the screen. The picture used is from a website that belongs to a company called FreeFoto. They have a variety of pictures, including holiday pics, landscapes, abstracts, etc. You can also use your own picture from your computer or a webcam. Features: The application comes with several pre-installed images that include holidays, nature, and everything in between. The application is fully customizable. You can choose to save the image to your computer, remove the IR background, and modify the picture settings. You can even change the picture source. New to YouTube (and video in general)? (Note: This has moved, so the link is now) Hi all, I am interested in working on the Video Editor component as part of a larger project, and would like to get feedback from people that may be using the Video Editor. This will be a long-term project and I'm planning to release it as part of the main Firefox repository once we can ensure that it is stable and can be supported for a reasonable time. I've tried to use a quick-and-dirty approach and I have incorporated feedback from the previous version that I have released, and some new ideas and design. The components: Video Editor: This is the main content of the application. I've named it "Video Editor" to show that it is more than just an editing application. It has three main functions: - Cut and paste: Insert the cut and paste commands into the right toolbar panel, and watch it work. - Timeline control: The timeline allows you to do some basic editing and trimming
