More specifically, the invention concerns a method for modifying one or more properties of one or more of a plurality of objects of a subject vehicle, and a method for controlling a brake system for the subject vehicle. In general, the properties of an object of a subject vehicle may comprise a plurality of parameters. Examples of a plurality of the parameters are the speed of the object, the acceleration of the object, and the distance of the object. One of the properties of the object may change over time. Some of the properties of an object may be preset by a human driver. Some of the properties of an object may be preset by an automatic vehicle control system, for example a cruise control or a speed control. Some of the properties of the object may be in open. For example, for air conditioning systems, the temperature of the air can be preset. The temperature of the air may e.g. be preset in case the driver would like to have a cold or a warm air temperature. The preset value of the temperature of the air is preset by the human driver. Because of the open adjustable properties of the object, an object from a subject vehicle may be considered as a “subject object”. One or more subject objects may be present in a “subject area”. For example, in the passenger compartment of the subject vehicle may be present a plurality of subject objects. The subject area comprises one or more object sensors that are present for measuring a plurality of parameters related to the object. The object sensors are typically positioned on the passenger side of the subject vehicle. On the driver side of the subject vehicle, an object sensor is typically not present. The object sensors are typically based on inductive technology or capacitive technology. The subject objects may be motionless or moving, static or dynamic, being present or absent. Because one object may be present in different locations, it may occur that the object sensor is located not in line-of-sight of the subject object. Thus, the object sensor may not be able to detect a parameter of the object. As example of an example of a subject vehicle, a semi-trailer vehicle, a tractor unit or a trailer may be present in the subject area. Some of the objects may be present
