In this course, you will gain a thorough understanding of the concepts of Mechanics, Engineering, and Mathematics as applied to hydraulics. You will also learn design and analysis techniques in a multi-disciplinary approach that includes hydraulics, engineering, and mathematics. The course is designed for students who do not have any background in hydraulics or hydraulics engineering. The course should be taken by all students who are majoring in Engineering, Civil Engineering, Mechanical Engineering, Applied Engineering, or a related field. This is also a great course for all other students who have limited/no background in the subject. There are classes on the Mechanical, Electrical, Computer, Piping, HVAC, Structural, and Environmental Engineering. Students should have prior knowledge in mathematics and basic calculus. This is a two-semester course. Class offered in Fall and Spring semesters. This project focuses on the application of the concepts of 3D laser scan data analysis, lab activities, and environmental quality metrics. Students will participate in a short 3D laser scan of a site and have the data analyzed. Students will also develop a lab activity that involves the use of photogrammetry to measure and analyze the percentage of saturated soil water. Students will also collaborate to develop an environmental quality metric that indicates saturation of groundwater in a 3D laser scan. This is a hands-on and interactive course that involves problem solving and developing new skills. Students will participate in an interactive lab experience in which they will practice the use of digital laser scanning and photogrammetry. Students will also learn to read and digitize a complex 3D data file and apply a computer software tool to analyze the file. Students will also learn how to create a photogrammetry model that will be validated by a human observer. All students will 55cdc1ed1c
