The deletion of the redundancy from the histogram is accomplished by the second checking process in the histogram formation process of FIG. 3. FIG. 4 shows a second checking process of the histogram formation process of FIG. 3. In the checking process, a deleting process is performed on the histogram, wherein the histogram is deleted if all the input characters are deleted by the first checking process. In the deletion process, a candidate of the delete is generated for each of input codes at which the input character is deleted, and is deleted from the histogram if the character is deleted. The deleting process is repeated for all input codes, and the histogram is formed by all the deleted codes and characters (codes of the delete candidate). The redundancy deletion process is not illustrated in FIG. 4. In the redundancy deletion process, only the output codes, which are not used as the input codes, are deleted from the histogram in the first checking process, for example. As shown in FIG. 4, in the case of input with less than the threshold length, the histogram is formed by all input codes except the redundancy. For the case of input with less than the threshold length, the repetition of the process from the block generation process to the second checking process is repeated until the histogram reaches the predetermined size, and the decoding process is executed. Thus, the redundancy code can be removed by the redundancy deletion process even in the case of input with less than the threshold length. The histogram formation process of the conventional Viterbi decoder is described with reference to FIG. 3. Referring to FIG. 3, if the number of the input codes is equal to the predetermined size (that is, all the input codes can be input as the input codes in the histogram formation process), the histogram formation process is finished. In the case of input with less than the predetermined size (that is, input of not all the input codes in the histogram formation process), the histogram formation process is repeated until the predetermined size is reached. In the histogram formation process, the process of FIG. 2 is performed until the redundancy is
