While the text of the event is embargoed until it's set, we can take a look at the slide presentations previewed by the Verge. What we see tonight is primarily a design refresh, which has been anticipated by Apple for quite some time. It seems to be a tidy update of iOS: taking the things people liked and fixing those that aren't quite working. Most notable is a change to the camera app, which looks relatively similar to the iPhone X launch version. There's an addition of the few people in your pictures, a welcome clarification to names in calls, and a simple layout for your photos. None of these things change the utility of the camera app itself, but they're nice additions to Apple's mobile operating system. The company's new FaceTime app gets a full makeover. It's now clear you can see your FaceTime displays in both chats, a nice bit of design. The developers have also added both Animoji and Memoji, but the former looks to be more of a novelty. The iPhone XS camera is also getting a full makeover. If your devices are more recent than that, the Pro doesn't have a launch date yet. Apple Music has moved over to a dark theme, similar to that of the TV app. All of the icons have been changed to a
