The decision comes after a move by the US-based search giant to change the way it sells apps in India. Google has already stopped selling Android apps on the Google Play Store, replacing it with a new app store, called Play Store India, that only shows apps and content that is supported by Indian laws and standards. And right after that, it recently stopped allowing app developers to use ads in their Android apps on the Google Play store. "We will remove apps that are, or are designed to be, used in ways that are, or are intended to be, contrary to applicable law, or that are or are intended to be used to harm minors in any way," Google wrote in a blog post. Google used its blog to explain the decision to remove all ads from its Android apps. It even removed all its other apps from its app store in India that just show apps in similar fashion. “We will no longer offer an Android app store that allows applications that offer users the ability to harm minors, or spread online child sexual abuse material to be downloaded and installed,” Google wrote. And that brings us to the Google Play Music. Before the change, the music streaming platform, Google Play Music, was advertised in the Google Play Store. But after the recent moves by Google, India banned the advertisement of content that offered “any form of encouragement to the commission of any offence, as determined under the Indian Penal Code, Indian Evidence Act, and the Information Technology Act, 2000, including, but not limited to, child pornography and child abuse.” In other words, ads on the platform could violate Indian laws. “Ads that promote the commission of these crimes are illegal under Indian laws. They are also in violation of our own
