Q: How to improve simulation results for the "always jump next h" algorithm? I have an algorithmic problem where I need to find a path through a graph between two cities. The edges are not weighted and there is no cost associated with the distance. I've implemented the "always jump next h" algorithm for this problem, and the problem works fine in many cases. However, I have to test it on a very large number of problems, and the simulation times that I get are very long (sometimes up to several minutes). I am trying to optimize the program, but I have no idea where to start. Any tips on where I should look would be very helpful.

A: If you want to be almost mathematically correct, then you will need to simulate the shortest path between all of the pairs of cities, and then discard the route that did not meet your expectations. If you have a reasonable number of cities, then the second step will take only a very tiny fraction of the time you spent on the first step.

File/Stream management for Applications 21 Jul 2019 (1 min) It's quite common to have an application that downloads a file at some point, as for example when opening the application for the first time. This can lead to an unknown size of the stream which causes problems with traditional file copying or even larger sized files. At Ataman we have built a database on top of a file system. It allows us to store the physical files on the file system, but fetch and write them from the database. This architecture allows us to store e.g. a big picture and to reduce the potential for disk access which we can see as the bottleneck of our application. Additionally, we can process the file in a single operation by updating the database. In this workshop we will show how to setup a file stream and how to store it in a database and update it as needed. It will also show how we can work with files in an application that is using the Ataman library.
