Category:Japanese idolsImage caption "If you say 'Come on, scoot over' to someone, they might just move over," says a snowman in Toronto A group of women have taken to the streets wearing winter coats and displaying crudely made signs to teach men a lesson about how to ask for permission. The group, who call themselves "motherly outreach", were handing out flyers to unsuspecting men in parking lots in Toronto, Canada, as well as in the city's parks. "Please ask our permission before you touch us," reads one sign. "You're touching our coat," it continues. "We don't know if you're nice or bad," adds another. The group is a registered charity and was founded in 1991 by former sex worker and activist Vanessa Myers. "They come to us when they're feeling threatened, stressed, you know, angry," Ms Myers told CBC News. "Women generally don't have an easy time asking for permission or telling people to leave them alone. "We kind of provide them with a safe haven. It can be a little dark in those parking lots and sometimes people are looking for a little bit of flattery or a little bit of romance." The group also visits nightclubs, bars and public places where women are out at night, says Ms Myers. "We could be going to the grocery store and some guy picks us up," she said. "We're with him in the car for a while and it's just like, 'Oh do you wanna do this or do you wanna do this?' "If he tells me, 'No, it's ok' I will respect that. And if he doesn't, it's time to go." Canada's largest city by population is always a cold one, reports the Associated Press, with average December temperatures of zero degrees Celsius. Ms Myers told CBC that women can talk to them about their problems, but when it comes to formal counselling they prefer to seek out the services of trained mental health therapists. The Rationale for Early (Pre-Stage 5) Detection of Testicular Cancer. Prevalence of testicular cancer has increased substantially in the past decade. Age-specific incidence is three to four times higher in the past 30 years than in the 50 years before that period, and the recent rise seems to be a function of an ageing population.
