Palivizumab is a humanized monoclonal antibody that is approved by the US FDA for prophylaxis of respiratory syncytial virus (RSV) in infants at high risk of severe RSV infection. Palivizumab efficacy is evaluated in a randomized double-blind, placebo-controlled trial, in which infants receive a one-time dose of palivizumab or placebo before the age of 6 months. Pre-specified post hoc analyses of this trial are currently being conducted to assess the efficacy of palivizumab in specific subgroups of infants. This article reviews the potential effect of pre-specified subgroup analyses on statistical power, the safety of palivizumab in these subgroups, and the need for cost effectiveness analyses for these subgroups. As previous pre-specified analyses may have already influenced the design of a new clinical trial, it is important for clinical trialists to be aware of potentials pitfalls.Wang Yang, a professor at the Harbin Institute of Technology in China, has been found guilty of sexual assault, according to The Guardian, and sentenced to "life imprisonment with hard labour." A secondary school teacher, Wang was found guilty of raping a 14-year-old student in 2001. The Chinese legal system (which insists that a man who asks for sexual favours is guilty of sexual harassment, even if the person requesting them doesn't believe he is asking for anything untoward) led to Wang being acquitted of rape and being found guilty of "indecent assault." 3e33713323
