Resilience has become the new buzzword as social media exploded. Social media is designed to bring people together – it is a form of human connectedness that we have not seen in history. In this case, this connectedness is terrible. It started as an inflight entertainment system on planes. When the first iPad was released to the public, it took off – and never stopped. In just a few short years, the use of smartphones has revolutionised communication. Social media has a reach that is almost impossible to imagine. But it is also easy. It is not a problem for people with poor impulse control or people who have a very low IQ – and it makes us vulnerable. During a crisis situation, social media is terrible. It is an online hangover with a worldwide reach. It will have a significant impact on any emergency response. The leading authorities on this issue say that the world is going to change. The way that we respond to disaster is going to change, but we are not making the necessary preparations. Tessa Bernhard is a manager at World Vision Australia. She says that social media and its impact will make things worse in times of crisis. “All of us, as a collective, have contributed to this global crisis,” she says. “So I think the chance for us to not only respond to it, but actually learn from it, is really important.” World Vision has had to learn lessons about the response to the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, Sudan. “It’s been a real challenge for us to actually be able to respond, as an NGO, when things like this happen and you don’t actually know what’s going to be happening on the ground,” says Tessa. World Vision is a Christian charity that is active in 120 countries around the world. Tessa says that the world is changing, and the digital world is the biggest change of all. “We are connecting from different parts of the world. Connecting with people, bringing people together, all across the world, because we can. The technology has given us the ability to connect in ways that we’ve never been able to before,” she says. She says that the humanitarian crises of the world are complex and that NGOs are not
