1. Field of the Invention The invention relates generally to semiconductor lasers and, more particularly, to a thermally-balanced multi-beam semiconductor laser that produces a plurality of output beams with parallel travel directions.

2. Description of the Related Art The demand for multi-channel coherent multi-wavelength laser sources with high power and reliability for spatial and spectral beam combining in photonic systems is growing. Prior art multi-wavelength semiconductor lasers capable of producing single and multiple output beams have been made with vertical or lateral structure facets as well as with distributed Bragg reflectors (DBRs) or Fabry-Perot resonator stacks (FRS). Each of these prior art techniques has significant problems. Conventional vertical geometry multi-beam semiconductor lasers typically operate with a heat sink to stabilize the temperature of the semiconductor laser chip. Although the heat sink stabilizes the operation of the lasers, such heat sinks add cost and complexity in the fabrication of the lasers. Furthermore, the heat sink itself adds heat capacity, thereby limiting the current that can be applied to the lasers. Thus, although heat sinks stabilize the operation of the lasers, they are also a potential thermal bottleneck to laser operation. Prior art lateral geometry multi-beam semiconductor lasers require multiple laser chip processing steps and are therefore more complicated and more expensive than single-beam lasers. Prior art DBR lasers require a metal-oxide stack that is difficult to epitaxially grow and expensive to process. Prior art FRS lasers require an antireflective coating (ARC) that is difficult to coat and not manufacturable on either the top or bottom surface of the laser chip. Furthermore, prior art FRS lasers typically have a finite difference between the lower and higher refractive index layers in the stack. This causes the reflection at the top or bottom end of the FRS to have a different group refractive index than that of the intermediate stacking layers which is highly sensitive to the angle of incidence of the incoming light. The angle of incidence determines the dispersion of the energy flow in the substrate. This leads to a re-distribution of the energy flow, which results in a spatially inhomogeneous output power. A need therefore exists in the art for a multi-beam semiconductor laser that
