Exploring the mechanism of the formation of liquid polyimides in polycondensation reactions by ab initio molecular dynamics simulation. Ab initio molecular dynamics (AIMD) simulations were performed to investigate the mechanism of the formation of liquid polyimides in polycondensation reactions. The performance of our newly developed ab initio polymerization code, which has recently been reported to be able to describe liquid polymers with high efficiency, was validated by examining liquid poly(hexafluoropropylene sulfone). The imide formation in the polycondensation of (per)fluorohexafluorobutanesulfonyl fluoride with p-aminophenyl monomer or p-aminophenyl sulfonyl fluoride as the monomer resulted in liquid polyimides that were found to contain two kinds of molecules that have high coordination numbers and long alkyl chains and are considered to be water-stable. The simulation results suggest that in these polycondensation reactions, the corresponding liquid polyimide molecules form by means of a two-step process. First, the monomer molecules transform into a highly coordinated intermediate molecule that contains a monocarboxylate head with two more water molecules coordinated. After that, the monocarboxylate head interacts with a neighboring monomer molecule with a carboxylate group to form a new water-
