Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to optical imaging systems and more particularly to an optical imaging system having two or more optical channels. 2. Background Description Optical imaging systems find wide application in the area of machine vision and robotics. Optical imaging systems often include a linear array of imaging elements that receive light from an object and produce an electrical signal that represents an image of the object. When used to sense the contours of an object, the resulting image is a high-resolution representation of the contours of the object. If the object has any surface features that are not aligned parallel to the direction of image-formation of the imaging elements, the resolution of the image can be severely reduced. In optical imaging systems, such as in contour sensing devices, it is desirable to produce images that are optically aligned to the optical axis of the imaging system. This is because the effective resolution of an image is proportional to the numerical aperture of the optical imaging system. The orientation of an image of an object relative to the optical axis of the imaging system is commonly referred to as the "image orientation." The orientation is generally defined by two angles
