The airlines are cutting back on flights because fuel costs are so high. Anything that can save costs has suddenly become hot property. As for me, my primary fuel is my appetite. An appetite for food that is big, rich and heavy. Food that fills me up. Food that is possible only because agriculture has progressed far beyond the basic instincts of hunters and gatherers to more efficient and, in the process, more luxurious ways to feed ourselves. It's kind of sad when people who want to take their car camping, along with their tent, sleeping bag and ice chest, can no longer afford to do so. Traveling to the farthest reaches of the globe should be an affordable and rewarding experience. But that's what hit me the other night after I looked at my gas mileage. According to my new three-year-old Volvo, I should drive 495 miles per gallon. Now, if it were possible to drive a Volvo without eating or sleeping, I imagine I could get about double that mileage. But the math doesn't work. I didn't drive 866 miles but 832 miles. My fuel cost me $59.86. I know, fuel costs are difficult to determine, but I do know that I can fly seven or eight times farther for the same money. I travel about 1,000 miles to get to the same point as I could do 400 miles by driving. And that's just on the way in and out. Flying to the travel destination is an entirely different story. 570a42141b
