

Oct 26, 2019 Gross pathology, in turn, aids in diagnosis of a given neoplasm through an examination of its gross morphology. The histologist performs this examination by examining the biopsy specimen under the microscope. In order to perform a microscopic examination of the biopsy specimen it is crucial to know what stains are required to enhance or diminish detail and thus enhance the diagnostic quality. A fluorescence microscope may prove helpful in analyzing the biopsy specimen but is not required. The simplest method, and what is most commonly used, is the H&E staining procedure. Histology is described by lay people as the study of the microscopic characteristics of cells. This is not accurate since the word "microscopic" usually refers to the examination of the details of a specimen under a compound microscope and is thus a microscopic procedure. Histology is the microscopic study of the tissue of the human body. He and his extended family live in a small mud-walled house in western Sudan, not far from the border with Chad. They were going to walk to Chad, a little over 200 kilometres away. It took them 10 days. Kacem was carrying a baby on his back, and he had a stick for protection against crocodiles. "It was so hot, I just couldn't carry on for a long time," he says. But the bit of dry land he reached was green, and fresh water made it easier for him and his family to survive. Kacem's journey was one of two journeys made by hundreds of Sudanese in recent months to leave Darfur, the western Sudanese state that has been convulsed since 2003 by widespread violence. Since December, the mostly Shia Muslim farmers of Jebel Marra have
