parvum in fecal samples from animal and human sources. A group of commercially available reference strains of Cryptosporidium were used as a representative panel of pathogenic and nonpathogenic strains for development of a simple polymerase chain reaction (PCR) assay that could be used to identify and quantify Cryptosporidium species directly from fecal samples. Cryptosporidium acidophilus, C. andersoni, and C. wrairi, and a small number of nonpathogenic strains were used for primer development. Assays were developed to identify C. parvum from a diverse set of isolates from animals and humans. To determine the specificity of the primers, primers were also designed to amplify a 344 base-pair fragment from beta-tubulin gene from C. muris. For detection of C. parvum, primers were PCR-amplified and the products were detected in an agarose gel. Bands of the size of a 344 basepair were also produced by C. muris isolates and appeared in all reactions with Taq I-digested and undigested DNA. The PCR assay detected C. parvum in a spectrum of fecal samples from 4 different species of animals and 2 different species of human. DNA yield from 1 microg of purified fecal samples was sufficient for 95% detection of C. parvum. C. parvum was detected in 48 of 53 (91%) water and drinking-water sources in which it was evaluated, and infected animals had the highest prevalence and concentration of C. parvum. Forty (31%) of 129 human fecal samples also were positive for C. parvum. These findings suggest that the PCR assay would be a useful tool for surveillance of C. par
