(Source: pixabay.com) The ability to accurately measure the level of oxygen in fluids is an important aspect of many different industries, and can even be used in everyday life. Oxygen level meters are available in a wide range of styles and sizes, from cheap touch-screen units all the way to more advanced handheld equipment that uses either an electrochemical cell or uses optical fiber for the detection of a low concentration of oxygen. While some units may be very large and heavy, some are rather compact and light enough for you to carry around in your pocket, or even belt. With that in mind, we take a look at some of the best models available. In addition, we present a list of the top-selling meters in different categories, with a brief description of each. The best oxygen sensors The most accurate oxygen meters on the market are undoubtedly those that use electrochemical cells. However, most of them tend to be bulky and huge, weighing more than a kilogram and even several kilograms. Consumer-grade electrochemical cells can also be quite expensive, ranging from $20 to $100. On the other hand, oxygen meters based on optical fiber may be easy to install, and can even be integrated into the structure of the fluid in which you need to measure the oxygen level. Pros: Reliable and affordable, these meters are very portable and can be used for a wide range of applications. Cons: The best-selling oxygen meters When it comes to the best-selling oxygen meters, you have a wide variety of models from brands such as Mettler, Avanquest, Maag, Mettler-Toledo, Tetra, Alpha, Stux and even WaterSense. These are the oxygen meters that are most likely to be used around the house, for example in the kitchen, as well as in classrooms. While there are many other models available on the market, we decided to go with the top five best-selling oxygen meters, and added the product name and the company, for more detailed information on each product. Mettler TAL 300SW Deluxe This is one of the best-selling meters in the Mettler line of products, as it comes with a 350 meter range, with the possibility of being extended up to 600 meters by using two additional units. In addition, it can also be wired to a PC, with an “s-cable”.
