seeds? I live in the Northern Hemisphere, and I have a late frost date of March 14 every year. I'm planting seed for a winter squash -- I'm not putting out bare dirt to grow squash, but rather starting them indoors so that they can go straight to a frost-free area. I figure that putting them indoors will give me a 10-20 week head start on them. Is this a good time to start seeds? And what's the best temperature to start them? I've read that they need around 70F, but nothing more specific than that. If you have experience with starting seeds, how quickly do you get them to at least an inch tall? And do I need a thermometer or another way to know when they're ready to start transplanting?
Thanks. A: Squash grows quickly and will start flowering and fruiting in 12 to 14 weeks. In your zone, it may start flowering in late February or even early March and fruiting in the last weeks of March. Ideally, you should start your seeds indoors 4-6 weeks earlier than that, depending on your zone, and/or use a protected indoor space, and plan to harden them off after transplanting. A: This is well after your frost date here, in April.
I started mine in January with the seed in a small plastic container (the size of a coffee mug). They germinated fine and grew quickly, so I don't think they needed to be "harden off".
The plants came through in fine shape after transplanting.
