"The Hahaha CS01, once described by an Electronics magazine as being as intelligent as a baby was one of the first synthesizers sold on the fruit market. It was the brain child of Alex Baumel, who, together with his friend

Jeff Kamen, designed and built the Hahaha CS01, which was first marketed in 1982. It was priced at only £80 ($165). The manual also stated that its sound was "as good as anything you'll find in the big music shops, but for a lot less!" The Hahaha CS01 is a stereo model with 4 equal and 4 alternate channels. All channels can simultaneously output both polyphonic and monophonic sounds. The polyphonic voice at a maximum of 16 notes/16 voice can be assigned to any one of the 16×16 addressable memory cells of the synthesizer. The hexadecimal addresses of the 16×16 memory cells can be changed in real time by reading the synthesizer's 16-bit data memory. The keyboards, sequencers and user programs are used to set and change the 1464 memory cells. In total, 64 memory cells are set by using the hardware sequencer, the control voltage of which is also used to set the filter cutoff- and ring-frequencies of the synthesizer. The number of notes that can be simultaneously stored varies from 60 to 200." Portable applications have grown in popularity in the last decade. The abundance of free software makes it possible for anyone to create their own applications and launch them.

Further, the Unity application paradigm is making it easier than ever for developers to create small and powerful software. There are many ways in which MIDI can be connected in a home studio to various devices which makes it easy for the user to record and edit MIDI audio through their PC. An example would be the use of a Mac as a powerful recording console, or the use of the RTAS and AU plugins, or even the use of a MIDI interface. When using the Mac as a recording console, the user is generally unaware of the fact that a MIDI device is connected to the computer. The RTAS plugin generates a waveform graph, and if the waveform/sound is sent to a Midi in/out device, it is recorded. RTAS is a free software developed by Native Instruments. The advantages of this software are - It is very easy to use. The user can record and edit audio by simply clicking a mouse button on the target wave
