Q: Duplication of Greek and Latin characters in OCR output I am using Tesseract for OCR of all the text in PDF documents, but I have noticed that in rare cases it is duplicating characters: Image of what I am talking about I have run some tests and it seems like this is happening when a character is repeated in close proximity (for example, a letter is repeated to fill a space). I don't know why this is happening because I don't have the OCR filter in place at the moment. I have turned the duplication off and it seems to have solved the problem, although it has made the OCR less accurate. From what I understand, this problem can be caused by characters being split into multiple words by the filter, hence the two characters are placed together in a single word and that can cause this problem. My question: Is there a way to enforce the filter to merge characters that are repeated in close proximity? I am thinking that maybe I could capture the OCR output file and then merge those characters by hand, but I am not sure if there is a better way. Note that this issue is happening on both English and Greek text. Thanks. A: If you have access to the PDF itself, it should be easy to remove the offending characters. First, remove the offending characters manually (as you've done), then extract the raw text by setting the language of the text stream to "en" or "el" (the numbers are the numbers at the beginning of the stream, which Tesseract uses as the language). For example, with a German PDF, the command line would be: `tesseract -l de -m D:/path/to/output.txt input.pdf` Note that Tesseract handles the Greek OTB, so you may only need the en/el output at the end of the command. Q: Weird behavior with Thread.sleep(long duration) Weird behavior of Thread.sleep(long duration) I was using a button press to start and stop a timed loop like below: `Timer timer = new Timer(); timer.scheduleAtFixedRate(new TimerTask() { @Override public void run() { // do something } }, 0, 3000);` That worked fine until I needed to stop the timer from main thread. Because java only allows one thread to run and the Timer is running as one thread, so I did below: `timer.cancel(); timer.purge(); try { timer.wait(100); } catch (InterruptedException e) { e.printStackTrace(); }` That works very well in stopping the Timer. But, the third parameter of Thread.sleep is long, so it's possible to sleep for a very long time. For example, when I was testing Timer, sometimes I press the button continuously, and when I stop pressing and release it, it would say that the timer was stopped but not really stop. It takes around 20-60s for it to stop. I'm wondering how to detect when it's really stopped. Thanks. A: The Timer is run by one thread and cancels that thread. After cancel, you have to invoke `Timer.purge()` which will exit the loop. If not, the loop will never stop. Once you do invoke `Timer.purge()`, you can't use `Timer.wait(...)` any more because it blocks until `Timer.purge()` returns. If it doesn't return in 100ms, you know it never will. If it does return before 100ms, you know it'll never return. I don't know if you want to use `Timer.purge()` or `Timer.stop()`. `Timer.stop()` can only be used once, to stop the Timer if you have to.
