To evaluate the results of repeat transrectal prostate biopsy (TRPBx) in men with an initial normal biopsy and abnormal prostate-specific antigen (PSA) levels who then have persistently elevated PSA levels. A total of 61 consecutive patients who had undergone an initial biopsy followed by persistently elevated PSA levels and subsequently underwent a repeat TRPBx were evaluated. Histology was divided into categories: benign, atypical small acinar proliferation, suspicious for cancer, and cancer. Biopsy results were compared with the initial biopsy and with follow-up biopsies performed at a median of 13.6 months later. A total of 63.2% of repeat biopsies were benign, 26.5% were atypical small acinar proliferation, 1.6% were suspicious for cancer, and 2.9% were cancer. Repeat biopsy was more likely to yield a benign biopsy than the initial biopsy (71.2% vs 50.6%; $P = 0.01$). There was no statistically significant difference in benign repeat biopsy yield between men with a persistently elevated PSA level and those with a persistently decreased PSA level ($P = 0.35$). Repeat biopsy is of benefit in men with a prior normal biopsy and persistently abnormal PSA levels, as it increases the yield of benign diagnoses and decreases the yield of prostate cancer.
