I usually hear such expressions in casual conversation, but I haven't heard it in formal documents, such as contracts or emails. In the web, I often see one side saying, "to be negotiated" or "pending deal". Is it grammatically correct? A: Is it grammatically correct? Yes, it is correct. If you are asking about the meaning of these phrases, it would be very subjective. They don't have any negative connotation as far as I know. It could mean that the issue needs to be negotiated or that they are awaiting any conditions to be met. At the end of October it was revealed that former FBI Director James Comey had rewritten a portion of the infamous 35-page memo that Donald Trump had asked him to write. Comey had denied writing such a memo during his testimony before the House Judiciary and Oversight Committees in May. The addition in Comey's memo was one letter in the Comey/FISA memo line — which means that the letter did not previously exist. On October 27, FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe — who reported to James Comey — told FBI Director Christopher Wray that Comey had “lost the confidence of the American people” and that the bureau should remove him as head of the FBI. McCabe made the comments after giving his testimony before the House Judiciary and Oversight Committees. TRENDING: BREAKING REPORT: President Trump to Nominate Amy Coney Barrett to Replace Ginsburg on the Supreme Court And now, Comey has confirmed that he wrote the memo and that it was in fact revised. So was the last portion of the memo written by the FBI or by the Trump administration? No. The last portion of the Comey memo was written by Comey. The New York Times reported on the matter on December 8: A week before the release of a report by former FBI Director James B. Comey that detailed President Trump's request for loyalty and the
