A role of the immune system in the clinical course of systemic lupus erythematosus. This article reviews the evidence for a role of the immune system in the pathogenesis of SLE and links that evidence to the clinical manifestations of the disease. There is substantial evidence that aberrant regulation of T-cell, B-cell, and dendritic cell function and interactions underlie the production of autoantibodies and the clinical symptoms of SLE. The most recent data suggest a major role for T cells in the production of autoantibodies, and the data are consistent with a dysregulation of the costimulation of antigen-presenting cells by cytokines. The data support the idea that T cells recognize autoantigens as foreign antigens, rather than antigenically altered self-tissues. Accordingly, our concept of SLE as a disease of autoantibody production, immune complex formation, and immune system activation may be incomplete. Recent findings support a major role of cytokines in the pathogenesis of SLE. We consider the possible mechanisms responsible for the breakdown in self-tolerance in patients with SLE. Data from our studies of B cell development in normal mice and SLE mice support a major role for Th2 cells in the production of autoantibodies
