The expression of gastrin and cholecystokinin (CCK) receptor subtypes (CCK-A and CCK-B) was studied in human and rat tissues by histochemical techniques. In rat tissues, a wide spectrum of immunoreactivity was observed for the CCK-A receptor throughout the small intestine. However, within the stomach, the highest concentration of the CCK-A receptor was within the pyloric mucosa, a region where the concentration of gastrin is highest. In the human stomach, the most intense staining was in the pit region. In rat gallbladder and in human gallbladder, immunoreactivity to the CCK-A receptor was observed on the apical surface of the glandular and non-glandular epithelium, whereas immunoreactivity to the CCK-B receptor was observed on the apical surface of all epithelial cells of the apical glandular region of the rat gallbladder. The reactivity of the CCK-B receptor in these tissues was similar to the staining pattern of the CCK-B receptor in rat antrum and duodenum. Reactivity for the CCK-B receptor was also observed in the proliferating cell compartment of the rat gallbladder.
