Your favorite Windows application will be on the cover of the next t-shirt. Look out for the t-shirt design for the game you just completed, share your photo and take part in the community. (C) 2014 Joes Gaming. All rights reserved. In its highest form, a screenshot captures the output of a piece of software for a specified period of time. It's one of the most reliable ways to test software. Despite its usefulness, however, this process can be a tedious one, especially if you want to take multiple screenshots during the testing phase. While there are lots of options on the market, in this article, we're going to look at two of the best screenshot tools available for Windows. My Screen Capture My Screen Capture is the most straightforward application, that you can find in your taskbar. When launched, it has a camera icon that can be dragged around the screen to capture the area you want to. Once you're done taking the photo, it will notify you and ask you to confirm before storing the file. The application's interface is very simple and easy to use. You can adjust the resolution of the picture, select the compression quality, and choose the file name. In addition, the application has an optional on-screen notification window where you can have a pop up to confirm that the picture has been captured and saved. Once you're done, you can remove the notification window or just hide it. You can also configure how to save your pictures. By default, they are stored in your default picture folder. This can be changed to any other location you'd like. You can even share your photo from there, which is the reason why it has on-screen notifications. Finally, if you click on the "Exit" button at the bottom of the application, it will minimize to the system tray. Basic Features What We Liked The application's interface is very simple and easy to use. You can choose to save your pictures on your system. You can share them with other people. You can adjust the resolution of your screenshot. The application has an optional on-screen notification window. What We Didn't Like There is no hotkey support, so you might have to use the Print Screen button. Other Applications Taking multiple screenshots can be a tedious task. For

Sign up today!As is known, during the past several years the world has been deeply engaged in what is called the "cold war" between the Soviet Union and the West. As such, there has been a pronounced interest in developing weapon systems to protect the United States and its allies against any threat posed by that country. The greatest present threat is posed by the Soviet space launch vehicles which have a capability to place large payloads into orbit. The problem is that the launch vehicles are relatively mobile and easily detected by the conventional means used by the United States and other countries to detect and track Soviet space launches. There is a need for a system which is effective in detecting such launches and which can be used to direct any missile to intercept the space vehicle before it enters orbit. Presently there are several different types of systems which are used for the purposes of detecting and tracking Soviet space vehicles. These are the infrared (IR) systems such as the Defense Support Program (DSP), which is based on a type of detector called the forward looking infrared detector (FLIR). In the DSP, the incoming missile tracks on-axis and off-axis. The off-axis threat is tracked and, if it is sufficiently large, the missile can be launched in time to intercept the rocket. The major problem with the DSP is that it is only marginally effective against satellites which are in orbit. With the satellites, the DSP only indicates the approximate area of the threat but does not know where on that area the threat is. Another system used for tracking Russian missiles is the Differential Beam Tracking system, which is a multi-channel tracking system. The system determines the angular position of the missile relative to the satellite. With a 100-millisecond window, there are 50,000 measurements per second, the system tracks the missile and then measures where on the surface the missile is relative to the satellite. Each channel of the system must have a separate antenna and a separate electronics package. The system has a resolution of one degree. The system cannot determine if the missile is on-axis or off-axis. The system has a number of problems. One is the large number of antenna and electronics packages. A second problem is that the system is not
