Recently, we have suggested the existence of cross-talk between the V1 and V0-ATPase complexes that could be involved in numerous physiological processes related to cancer. We have shown that the co-expression of the nuclear V1 catalytic subunit Haptoglobin A (Hp) with V1 regulatory subunit abrogates the growth in soft agar of rat hepatoma McA-RH(7777) cells that express high levels of Hp. To identify the mechanism underlying this inhibition, we have set out to determine the role of the V1 delta-subunit in McA-RH(7777) cell growth. Our data clearly indicate that this subunit has a pro-proliferative activity in these cells. Sub-cellular distribution analysis showed that the delta-subunit is located principally in the plasma membrane. This growth-promoting effect of the delta-subunit appears to be a direct consequence of its catalytic action, since in V1delta-
