Coronary Atherosclerosis

With Obesity and Hypertension. Objectives In this study, we examined whether there is an association between coronary atherosclerosis and obesity and/or hypertension.

Methods In the present study, we included 200 patients from our outpatient clinic who had undergone coronary computed tomography (CT) coronary angiography. The patients' body mass index (BMI) was calculated from their height and weight.

Coronary plaque was classified as none, noncalcified, mixed, and calcified. Carotid intima-media thickness (IMT) was assessed on an average of three measurements per side. The mean IMT was calculated using the average of the six measurements.

Patients were divided into four groups based on the number of risk factors. The number of patients in the four groups was as follows:

10 patients with hypertension, 17 patients with hypertension and obesity, 12 patients with hypertension and smoking, and 73 patients with none of the four risk factors. Results Analysis of covariance revealed a significant association between coronary plaque presence and the number of risk factors (P=.005). There was also a significant association between the number of coronary risk factors and mean IMT (PQ: How to
