I was at a family reunion and the following conversation took place: A: "There used to be a big dinosaur in Texas." B: "What's that got to do with you?" The expression on his face was priceless. I like dinosaurs. I like typewriters. I like cities. I like my coffee. I am a glass half empty kind of girl. I drink my coffee black, so I love days like today when it's sunny, the wind is blowing and the coffee smells are coming from my neighborhood coffee roaster. This is as close to perfection as I can get. Intestinal mucosa responds to increased gastrointestinal hydrostatic pressure by modifying the composition of the mucus layer. In the normal human distal small intestine, the villi are covered by a mucus layer which surrounds a lamina propria of epithelial cells. The layer of goblet cells surrounding the villi has a thinner basement membrane than that of the lamina propria. These cells are highly sensitive to the development of Na+ and Cl- transport across their basolateral membranes as well as their movement of HCO<sub>3</sub>- down their secretory pathway. In order to study how human intestinal mucosa responds to increased gastrointestinal hydrostatic pressure, we modified the dietary intake of sodium and chloride by administering rehydration solutions containing either NaCl or NaCl plus glucose. In the first two hours following this treatment there was a significant elevation of the total luminal fluid (TLF) volume in jejunal segments of the rehydration solution (RS) group, from 86 +/- 7.8 to 162 +/- 8.4 ml (P less than 0.001). This was attributed to a rise in plasma osmolality as measured by the use of an osmometer. Villus height was unaffected by the increased intestinal hydrostatic pressure. Villi of the RS group showed no signs of cellular damage or inflammation. To assess the nature of the proteins present in the mucus and mucosa of the jejunum and ileum of the RS group, the protein profiles of these two layers were compared by isoelectric focusing of the mucosa, followed by gel electrophoresis.
