SHAREit: The goal of this study was to compare the properties of three commercial Joomla! templates with the properties of the codebase of Joomla! 2.5 and investigate whether any commercial Joomla! templates could be considered a good starting point for future template development. The choice of the three commercial templates used for this study was motivated by their close relationship with the Joomla! 2.5 codebase and the fact that they are available as a separate package. The secondary purpose of this study was to replicate the comparison of the three commercial templates with the codebase of Joomla! 2.5 that had been made in the Global Joomla! Template Study. The study also presents an overview of relevant Joomla! 2.5 features that all commercial templates use and the extent to which they implement those features. A Markov model was used to predict the stability of code updates for Joomla! 3.x. The study used existing statistics, lists of components, and a sample of the Joomla! 2.5 and 3.x codebases to conclude that a high number of extensions are needed to duplicate the code of a Joomla! 2.5 template for Joomla! 3.x (i.e. the codebase of an installation that contains all the extensions of a commercial template). This is a good reason for beginning a Joomla! 3.x project by reusing a template that is close to the codebase of a Joomla! 3.x installation. The study found that the code of the three commercial templates is on average larger than the codebase of Joomla! 2.5. The average number of functions per template is more than twice as high in the commercial templates as in the codebase of Joomla! 2.5. The average number of global function calls to template-related functions is also higher in the commercial templates than in Joomla! 2.5. The number of templates and functions per template is also higher in the commercial templates. Based on a sample of fifteen Joomla! 2.5 extensions and the reviews of the three commercial Joomla! templates, the study concluded that the majority of extensions can be immediately reused when developing a Joomla! 3.x template. The study found no compelling evidence to suggest that Joomla! 3.x can be more stable than Joomla! 2.5. Joomla! 09e8f5149f
