From our study it is evident that Italian states have been successful in reaching the target of "zero-tolerance" for cancer with regards to screening mammography, but a "zero-tolerance" is not the target that has been reached for cervical cancer. It appears that a collaborative effort among the states to collect reliable and representative data in the future could provide valuable information about the influence of socio-economic and demographic factors on the incidence of cancer in the Italian population. However, more research is needed to understand the reasons why incidence of cervix cancer and breast cancer has been steadily increasing among women aged 30-49 years and decreases after age 50.
