The above video is a recreation of the popular Lotus Esprit Turbo. The video, shot by Lotus' own John Dalliston and zapped up to the internet by the tech blog The Next Web, shows the car in slow motion. On the car's 30th birthday, we'll find out if it lives up to its 40 years of reputations. Photo: Lotus The original Esprit, produced by

Lotus from 1984 to 1990, was the holy grail of automotive performance. What emerged from the once-legendary engineering team of Colin Chapman and his successor, engineer Mike Bartels, however, was a little something else. The road-going version of the Esprit-based DMC DeLorean was never a commercial success, but it still holds a place in automotive lore. If you were lucky enough to own one, you're still revered by DeLorean freaks and retro-futurist car fiends alike. There's also the model that was part of the Roadster of the Year award last year, the Evora 400, which, with a top speed of 193 mph, is the fastest-accelerating production car ever built. (The 1980s BMW M5 would have topped that speed with ease, but it was never made.) The next version of the Esprit will be powered by the same 2.5-liter Twin Cam engine that's in the current generation of the company's Evora model. It will be the first engine design developed from scratch since the new, 3.5-liter twin-turbo V6 powerplant in the Evora 400.

The car will also boast a re-matched four-wheel-drive layout, something Bartels says has never been seen in the performance-oriented market until now. As for when it will hit the road, Dalliston says production will begin in the second half of 2018.
