Liver has well-developed scavenger receptor. We previously reported that liver Scavenger Receptor I (Scr-I) is related to the disposition of certain new chemical substances. As Scr-I-knock-out mice are of little utility for drug toxicological studies, the role of Scr-I in the disposition of drug metabolites in humans should be explored. In this article, the inhibitory effect of compounds on the binding of Scr-I to microsomal lipid was examined and was found to be correlated with the reactive uptake (focusing on reactive metabolites) of Scr-I in mice. The predominant reactive species responsible for the binding of liver Scavenger Receptor I to microsomal lipid was identified as superoxide anion (O2-). Compounds with the reactive oxygen species (ROS) scavenger capacity might be candidates of drugs with reactive metabolites. Possible mechanisms of drug metabolism will be discussed in light of the findings.Finally, a molecular basis for oscillatory photosynthesis in Thermosynechococcus elongatus at low light intensities.
