The interaction between maternal environment and offspring fitness during lactation has remained largely unexamined. We test the hypothesis that lactational effects on offspring fitness vary over the interval between birth and weaning, because of changes in maternal intake and consumption patterns. The mother-infant pair was housed in a novel, exposure-dependent environment with a limited diet. Mothers did not eat for the first two weeks after parturition, and fed exclusively milk to their young. Following weaning, mothers ate intermittently for the first 6 days and then ate all the time, providing an intake of 2350 kJ per day. During these four stages of maternal development, maternal intake was manipulated, as well as food availability. Maternal behaviour was observed and assessed using behavioural observations and video analysis. Lactational effects on maternal behaviour varied with the inter-conversion between maternal stages. The transitions between feeding and non-feeding stages produced a change in the quality and quantity of maternal behaviour. Reproductive output was examined using survival and breeding success of offspring. In the feeding stages, offspring showed reduced survival. However, while reproductive success was reduced in the non-feeding stages, food availability was increased for the majority of the day. The results indicate that the interaction between maternal environment and fitness of offspring depends on the stage of development and that this can have substantial implications for the fitness of offspring.
