BEIJING (Reuters) - China's foreign currency reserves fell to a record $2.43 trillion in October, as the U.S. dollar hit another record high, thanks to a slowdown in economic growth and the trade war with Washington. FILE PHOTO: A representative for China's foreign exchange regulator (foreground) attends a news conference at the Foreign Exchange Management Association (FEMAC) headquarters in Beijing, China, August 26, 2018. REUTERS/Jason Lee The fall of $12.3 billion, to $2.43 trillion, was the biggest monthly drop in a decade. Total reserves, which hit $2.44 trillion last month, are down 7% from a year earlier, according to the State Administration of Foreign Exchange (SAFE). "What has driven the fall in the October foreign currency reserves is the plunge in the value of the U.S. dollar, which have weighed on China's reserves," said Zhao Kangkang,
