The game also delivers a host of game-changing innovations, including the addition of “Attacking Intelligence,” which is designed to enhance the dynamic of attacking play through the intelligent positioning of players in possession of the ball at all times. As this video shows, on motorways the E-ZPass reader requires the card to match the corresponding EZ-Link name. This seems very inefficient and arbitrary. What are the drawbacks of this system? How would the EZ-Link differentiate between the various E-ZPass-compatible cards? A: The first obstacle is the whole system cannot work for people without any highway-use-affiliation: If you hold no affiliation card, you can't use the E-ZPass. It seems redundant to force people to hold one, until you don't expect to be on a highway anymore. In an European highway network, where also the other way around happens, the problem may come up: In German highways, E-ZPass works the other way around: So people who do not use highways at all still have to acquire an affiliation card that is tied to their licence plate and fulfill some kind of tax. What an unnecessary annoyance. Also, people without an affiliation card are forced to buy one just for using a highway. It makes no sense. So the E-ZPass actually works only on highways where automated toll collection is used: The other additional drawback is that the E-ZLink only acts on some kind of highways. Note also, that there are exceptions like for example on Berlin roads that do not have fee-free lane crossings, like the Landwehrkanal, where there are “free lanes” for goods transport, which do not apply for travel-related vehicles. This means that the E-ZLink cannot be used on the toll-free parts of the Autobahn. This is something that I wouldn't be so upset about - if the E-
